

Walking a Reconciliation Labyrinth

This labyrinth design came out of Clare Wilson's life growing up in South Africa, a country divided by colour, a country in which we do not start our journey from the same place.

It is a tool for problem solving and relationship building and, having two entrances, it acknowledges that we do not start our journey from the same place.

However, if we begin our labyrinth walk with an intention to relate, to recognize our differences and to grow in our strength of diversity we can start our journey towards where people really care about each other.

Sometimes the Path allows us to travel alongside each other, sometimes it takes us away and sometimes towards each other.

But, if we keep walking, when we are at the furthest point from the divided Entrance, we find that we are on the same Path

As we then cross over and walk the Path the other has walked we can begin to understand how life's experiences have shaped us to be the way we are today.

Eventually, we reach our " heart space " where we need to decide to either walk out of the labyrinth on our separate Paths or to walk into the centre together – a place that belongs to us all.

When it is time to leave, we find the third Path to exit "through the body" and on our feet, walking into the future, still "not-knowing" but on a journey of hope.

Walking the Path to Tomorrow Together.
Learn more about Clare Wilson's journey

<http://www.labyrinths.co.za/walking.html>